According to the graph, women seem to have less leisure time than men do. We can see that men in all the countries in the graph have more leisure time than women do. In particular, Italy and India have the largest gaps between men and women. In contrast, Norway seems to have achieved a balance where both men and women have around 370 minutes of leisure time per day. It is surprising that gaps in leisure time in advanced nations still exist between the sexes.

As for the reasons why these gaps occur, I believe the main one to be the amount of time women spend on taking care of children. Although our societies have changed a great deal, women still have a tendency to look after children more than men. It is also likely that the majority of women cook for their families, in turn reducing their leisure time.
